

MOTHER AND SON — Patti Callistro Stiewing and son Toby leaf through Mrs. Stiewing's book on her daughter's ordeal with cancer. (Sunday Post photo by Henry Roman)

Ordeal still has meaning

(Continued from C1.)

for the volume.

One of the difficulties which Mrs. Stiewing says she first had to overcome was the attitude of doctors stating that there was nothing wrong with her child.

"Here I had found a tumor behind her ear, and doctors, many of whom are respected members of their profession, were trying to make me believe there was nothing wrong. One well-known doctor in this area actually wanted me to believe it was an abnormal bone growth that she would probably outgrow. Can you believe it?" said Mrs. Stiewing.

According to Mrs. Stiewing, it took six months for her to finally convince doctors that something was actually wrong with her daughter. "It was about that time when she hit her head on the fireplace, and the tumor doubled in size. We tried all sorts of treatments and therapies and nothing seemed to help," she recalled. When the tumor developed and therapies appeared to stop working, doctors operated to remove the growth.

"It was a rapidly growing cancer. Shortly after the operation a second tumor grew in the same spot. I tried everything to get help for her, even public appeals, but finally I decided to take her to the Grand Bahamas to get treatment from Dr. Lawrence Burton," she said. Burton, an immunotherapist, tried several treatments which halted the tumor growth.

"YOU COULD actually see her condition improving. But eventually it was apparent that Amber was going to need another operation. Doctors in the United States didn't want anything to do with Amber then because she had dropped out of their conventional treatments. Dr. Burton was so helpful, he actually paid for us to fly to Canada to see doctors there about the operation. By then, though, it was too late. So we came back here to be with each other," said Mrs. Stiewing.

Doctors, said Mrs. Stiewing, could accomplish a great deal if they worked together to conquer cancer. "Everyone has friends and relatives dying of cancer around them. I think doctors, if they would just forget the politics, and not try to just push their single form of therapy on patients, more people would live," she said.

Throughout the ordeal, Amber, according to her mother, did not suffer pain until the last few months. "I was so thankful that God spared her from that pain," she added.

Now that she has completed the book, Mrs. Stiewing said she feels as if a weight has been lifted off her shoulders. But not until it is published and in bookstores will she mourn the loss of her daughter.

"I can't explain what drove me to finish this massive book. It's something I had to accomplish for Amber's sake. Once it's complete I'll probably go somewhere and have a good cry," she said.

UNTIL THEN, she is enjoying life with her husband Gary, and sons Todd, 7, and Toby, 14 months. "I wonder if the same thing could happen to Toby. There's no guarantee, I suppose, that it won't. I hope it doesn't, but if it did I'd know this time who to believe and who not to," she said.

Mrs. Stiewing said she hopes the book will help families who are now dealing with the same difficulties. "Amber wanted to help other children, and through this I think she will," said Mrs. Stiewing.